

Jordan Eberhardt

Jordan is a relative newcomer to the gardening game; she graduated from UNL in 2013 with a degree in sociology and spent a total of 8 years in the social work and human services field. After that, she quit and vowed to never work behind a desk again.

Combining a passion for the outdoors, a background growing up on a farm, and a desire to work in parks, Jordan started working for the public gardens in Lincoln, NE in 2017. There she discovered a love of all things growing and began gardening as a hobby.

Jordan is passionate about addressing sociological issues—such as food deserts and environmental issues such as unethical farming practices—with a small scale farming model. Her interests include riding bikes, camping, gardening, reading, and social justice.
